HIGHLIGHTED RESEARCH CENTRE: VU CHINA RESEARCH CENTRE (VCRC)
China used to be that faraway origin of cheap goods and the region where all multinationals were trying to set up shop. We were caught off guard, when China was pronounced the world’s second economy in 2010 and during the following years Chinese companies started buying up European businesses or setting up new companies in our backyard. The same happened with Japan a few decades earlier. Academics then vied to study the driving forces behind that Japanese miracle. However, in the case of China, in spite of the fact that an entire bookstore could be filled with books introducing China alone, the people in the field only find their Chinese counterparts puzzling and their behaviour hard to comprehend.

In my opinion, the reason behind this lack of understanding is that modern China studies have started on the wrong foot. Most researchers take the converging point of view, i.e. the idea that people of all regions of the globe are converging towards Western values and practices, for granted. I challenge that belief and instead contend that social practice in a certain region can only be understood from the perspective of the people in that region. My own research is based on the approach and the VCRC is collecting a growing group of researcher sharing this basic assumption. This is not restricted to business studies.

VU researchers from the faculties of Law and Social Sciences may join and I regularly scout for suitable Chinese PhD candidates to add to our research force. The following is a list of research projects that already are in various stages of execution:

- Chinese Organizing Processes – Peter Peverelli (VU FEWEB); fundamental research studying Chinese organizing processes and the social embeddedness of Chinese organizations.

- Sources of China Entrepreneurship - Peter Peverelli (VU FEWEB), Lynda Song (Renmin University of China); this is a long-term (8 years already) project studying the social capital of Chinese entrepreneurs.

- Chinese Investment in Europe – Ma Yuan (Chinese PhD candidate, VU FSW); This research focuses on the influence of the personal motivations of the managers involved.

- Multi-religious Chinese Families – Bram Colijn (PhD candidate, VU Theology); The central question of this project is: How are family rituals negotiated between Protestants and practitioners of Popular Religion in Xiamen?
