Dr. Montserrat Prats López successfully defended her thesis.
On 14 June Montserrat Prats López successfully defended her thesis titled "Managing Citizen Science in the Humanities: The challenge of ensuring quality "

Nowadays, the organization of work and leisure time, diverse and unknown beforehand, raises concerns about the quality of citizen science outcomes. Since high-quality information is essential for scientific research, the question is how is the need for quality addressed in the organization of citizen science projects? This question is answered through a multiple-case study that follows and compares five citizen the way we communicate and explore the world, are no longer subject to space and time constraints. The Internet has been essential in the emergence of new forms of organizing human activities. This dissertation examines the phenomenon of citizen science, a participative form of organizing and conducting scientific research that involves citizens in the collection and processing of data through the Internet. However, involving citizens, who are not necessarily experts and whose knowledge is science projects in the field of the humanities. The research findings suggest that to ensure the quality of information resulting from citizen science, project leaders invest time and effort in managing knowledge work performed by citizens and supporting their learning process, even if this means using technology in unintended ways.

Montserrat Prats López (1974) is Assistant Professor of Information Science at the Open University of the Netherlands. She graduated in Business Administration at the Universitat Autònoma of Barcelona in 1998. She received her MSc degree in Business Administration (Cum Laude) from the Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam in 2012 and carried out her PhD project at this same university. Prior to that, she worked as market research manager at Philips Consumer Electronics and as information specialist at the VU Library. Montserrat's research interests are knowledge management, organizational learning, technology and organizing.

New book for practitioners by Stefan Heusinkveld
There are plenty of influential ideas in management and consulting. But what do we actually know about the way these management ideas came about? And how are we tempted to make use of them? In the new book of VU University Associate Professor Stefan Heusinkveld he describes the origins of management ideas and how they are developed by consultants and gurus.

De managementideeënfabriek (The management idea factory) looks behind the scenes of influential ideas such as the BCG Matrix, 7S Model, Total Quality Management (TQM), Balanced Scorecard (BSC), Customer Relationship Management (CRM), Lean Management, Agile, and Corporate Social Responsibility.

Human effort
While many of these ideas are widely known among managers, consultants and scientists, there are too few critical questions about their origin and development. This book addresses this, it shows that management ideas are the result of fallible human effort – but at the same time by people who understand their trade.

Managers and consultants
Heusinkveld wrote the book for managers and consultants. They can sharpen their ideas and critique on the ideas they receive in books, seminars and from their colleagues.

Stefan Heusinkveld is Associate Professor at the Department of Management and Organization of the Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam.

The Management Idea Factory was published at Boom.

ABRI Barbecue closure of another very successful year
As a closure of this great and very successful academic year, on Tuesday, June 13, ABRI office organized the annual barbecue for the whole ABRI research community (and beyond), which took place after the last ABRI Research Seminar of this academic year.

The barbecue was a nice occasion for everyone to reflect on all the great projects, publications, new educational programmes and other successes that have been achieved this year, as well as to hear about everyone’s fresh and exciting plans for the next academic year.
